History of Political Cartoons in Russia

The tradition of political cartoons in Russia dates back to the 18th and 19th centuries, coinciding with the rise of print media and political discourse. Early Russian satirical prints often targeted the monarchy, bureaucracy, and societal issues, reflecting popular sentiments and dissent. During the Soviet era, political cartoons became a state-controlled medium used primarily for propaganda, promoting communist ideology and criticizing perceived enemies of the state. Despite censorship, underground and dissident artists found subtle ways to express criticism through metaphor and allegory. In the post-Soviet period, political cartoons have flourished in newspapers, magazines, and digital platforms, offering a more diverse and sometimes controversial perspective on Russian politics and society.
