The state features 351 cities and towns, each with its own local government structure. These municipal boundaries are essential for defining local jurisdiction, taxation, public services, and community identity. The distinction between cities and towns in Massachusetts is based largely on governance style rather than population size, with cities typically governed by a mayor and city council, while towns are often managed by town meetings or boards of selectmen.

Types of Municipal Governments

The political map of Massachusetts reflects various forms of municipal governance, including:

- Mayor-Council Government: Common in cities such as Boston and Worcester, where executive and legislative branches are separate.
- Council-Manager Government: Found in some municipalities where a professional manager oversees daily operations under the direction of an elected council.

Political maps clearly outline these municipal boundaries, which are critical for elections, zoning, and local policymaking.

Federal Congressional Districts in Massachusetts

The political map of Massachusetts also displays the federal congressional districts, which determine the state's representation in the U.S. House of Representatives. Massachusetts is divided into nine congressional districts, each electing one member to Congress. These districts are drawn to balance population equality and comply with federal and state laws. The political boundaries of these districts play a vital role in national politics and resource allocation.
