The late 11th century was a period marked by religious fervor, political instability, and territorial disputes across Europe and the Near East. Pope Urban II's speech occurred in this milieu, during the Council of Clermont in November 1095. At this time, the Byzantine Empire faced increasing pressure from Seljuk Turks, threatening the stability of Christian territories in the Eastern Mediterranean. The call for help from Byzantine Emperor Alexios I Komnenos to the West set the stage for pope urban's speech, which aimed to rally Western Christendom to assist their Eastern brethren and reclaim Jerusalem.
