Definition of Post Touchdown Attempt

A post touchdown attempt is the play immediately following a touchdown where the scoring team tries to earn additional points. This attempt can result in either one or two extra points being added to the team's score, depending on the method chosen and the outcome of the play.

Common Usage in Sports Media

In sports journalism and media outlets such as the NYT, the phrase often appears in game analyses, score descriptions, and puzzles. It captures a fundamental aspect of football scoring that is essential for understanding game progress and final results.

Rules Governing Post Touchdown Attempts in Football

Post touchdown attempts are strictly regulated by the official rules of American football, which differ slightly between leagues such as the NFL, NCAA, and high school football. These rules specify how and where the attempt is made, the scoring outcomes, and the procedures following a touchdown.

Types of Post Touchdown Attempts

There are two main types of post touchdown attempts:

- Extra Point Kick (Point After Touchdown - PAT): The team attempts a placekick from a specified yard line, aiming to kick the ball through the uprights for one additional point.
- Two-Point Conversion: The team runs a single play from the two or three-yard line (depending on the league) attempting to carry or pass the ball into the end zone again for two points.

Procedure and Yard Lines

In the NFL, the extra point kick is attempted from the 15-yard line, making it roughly a 33-yard field goal. The two-point conversion attempt takes place from the 2-yard line. College football positions the ball at the 3-yard line for both attempts. The choice between kicking or going for two points is strategic and often depends on the game situation.

Scoring Impact

A successful extra point kick adds one point, while a successful two-point conversion adds two points to the team's total score. A failed attempt yields no additional points but can influence the momentum and tactics for the remainder of the game.
