Rhyming is a linguistic technique that involves matching the ending sounds of words, often enhancing the aesthetic quality of written or spoken language. The word “communication” is a polysyllabic word, ending with the sound “-ation,” which is a common suffix in English. This suffix provides a large pool of potential rhymes, as many English words share this ending, creating a rich field for rhyme generation. Understanding the phonetic structure of “communication” helps in identifying both perfect and near rhymes that complement its sound pattern. This section examines the phonology and characteristics of words rhyming with “communication,” setting the foundation for exploring specific examples.

Phonetic Structure of Communication

The word “communication” is pronounced /kə,mju:nɪ'keɪʃən/, with the stress on the fourth syllable. The ending “-ation” is pronounced /'eɪʃən/, making it a common rhyme base in English. Many nouns and verbs that have been nominalized share this suffix, allowing for a broad spectrum of rhymes. Recognizing this suffix and its sound pattern is crucial for identifying words that rhyme with “communication” accurately and effectively.

Types of Rhymes Relevant to Communication

There are several types of rhymes applicable to “communication”: perfect rhymes, where the ending sounds exactly match; near rhymes or slant rhymes, which have similar but not identical sounds; and multi-syllabic rhymes, which match multiple syllables, creating more complex and sophisticated sound correspondences. This diversity allows writers to choose rhymes that best fit their style and purpose.
